FOREWORD

The U.S. Army Research Institute for the Behavioral and Social Sciences (ARI) is engaged in research to support Special Operations Forces (SOF) personnel development. One of the critical areas of this development is preparation for working effectively in foreign countries. This report documents a research effort to identify intercultural training programs and related resources available to military personnel at the postgraduate level. These are detailed in program abstracts in U.S. Regional Guides to institutions of higher education. Overseas opportunities for graduate study in conjunction with university degree programs are listed in World Area Guides. Additionally, there is a description of relevant professional associations and consortia and a Resource Collection of selected college catalogs and other reference sources.

The Leadership and Organizational Change Technical Area of ARI's Manpower and Personnel Research Division conducted this research under ARI 6.3, the advanced development program. The research was undertaken in 1991 under a Memorandum of Agreement between the U.S. Army Special Operations Command (USASOC) and ARI (20 June 1991), with project completion in February 1992. The results were briefed to the Commanding General, U.S. Army John F. Kennedy Special Warfare Center and School (USAJFKSWCS) on 20 May 1992. The products of this research will assist USAJFKSWCS staff in selecting available training program options for SOF personnel who must develop intercultural skills.

Technical Director

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

There are many people to thank for their cooperation and assistance. First, I wish to thank the U.S. Army Research Institute for the Behavioral and Social Sciences (Nora K. Stewart) for supporting this research under the auspices of the U.S. Army Research Office Scientific Services Program and Battelle for assistance in administering it. Also, I wish to thank the personnel at the John F. Kennedy Special Warfare Center and School, Fort Bragg, North Carolina, and at the U.S. Air Force Special Warfare School, Hurlburt Field, Florida, for their cooperation.

Most important, I wish to acknowledge the major contributions of the other members of the investigative team. George Langham, with extensive knowledge acquired as a military and foreign service officer, has been invaluable. Selma Myers, with a command of intercultural management skills and a broad network developed as a professional in this field, has also been a key contributor to this report, particularly on private sector and professional associations. Their expertise, combined with my many years of overseas study and experience and leadership of university intercultural training programs, all served to enhance this report.

This project could not have been completed without the help of those involved in disseminating information about university programs. I wish to acknowledge and thank the university graduate admission officers for providing information and college catalogs, individuals at Peterson's Gradline who assisted in using their online data base, and the Institute of International Education for information on academic year abroad programs. I also wish to thank David S. Hoopes, an inspiring role model, for his major contributions to the intercultural field and particularly for his contribution, along with Kathleen R. Hoopes, the Guide to International Education in the United States. It served as one of the starting points for this study and is included in the Resource Collection.

Appreciation is also extended to hundreds of individuals who shared their time and knowledge. A special thanks to the corporate and human resource managers, intercultural consultants, executives, and military and foreign service officers we interviewed abroad and in the United States, and to the people at centers for international business education and in professional associations. The information they shared and the materials they sent all contribute to an understanding of what is being done in this expanding arena of preparation for overseas service.

Questions, comments, and suggestions regarding this report are welcomed, as is information that updates programs. Please contact Claire K. Langham or Selma Myers, Intercultural Development, Inc., 6567 Edmonton Avenue, San Diego, CA 92122-2514, Tel. 619-457-0882 or 619-755-3160.

AN OVERVIEW OF INTERCULTURAL TRAINING: GRADUATE-LEVEL PREPARATION FOR MILITARY SERVICE ABROAD

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Requirement:

The Office of the Commanding General, John F. Kennedy Special Warfare Center and School, Fort Bragg, North Carolina, requested the Manpower and Personnel Research Division, U.S. Army Research Institute for the Behavioral and Social Sciences (ARI) to develop a comprehensive report outlining available research and training programs to prepare personnel to work effectively in foreign countries.

Procedure:

To provide this overview of intercultural training, the investigative team identified all relevant programs. They gathered specific information from library sources, the Gradline online data base, university catalogs, program brochures, and professional associations. Additionally, targeted contacts in the military, public, academic, and private sectors were interviewed by phone and in person. For the exploratory investigation of private sector intercultural training, 89 interviews, ranging from 10 to 30 minutes each, were conducted by telephone or in person.

To organize this comprehensive report, symbols were selected to represent specific categories so that information could be presented concisely.

The analytical and evaluative component of this report relates to identifying the programs most relevant to midcareer military personnel preparing for service in other countries. The procedure of the investigative team was to be comprehensive while focusing on graduate degree programs that offer specializations in various world regions. Another element was to distinguish quality degree programs. A key criterion was successful competition for federal funding. Names of the institutions of higher education with international programs awarded federal support by the Department of Education through Title VI appear in boldface type. To make it easier to compare and contrast program degrees and resources at these federally supported institutions, a two-page chart with codes was devised.

Findings:

This report provides an overview of more than 1,000 graduate-level international/intercultural training programs in the United States and abroad. It describes military advanced degree programs, public sector and federally supported programs, and research and advanced academic degrees in international and area studies. Program abstracts are in the guides described below. Private sector interviews indicate that most companies do not place emphasis on predeparture intercultural training. However, recognition of its importance and the use of consulting firms are increasing.

The U.S. Regional Guides to international and area studies programs identify over 700 intercultural training programs at 200 institutions of higher education (IHEs) that offer graduate-level programs in those degree fields especially appropriate to preparing military personnel for service abroad. These IHEs are organized by geographic region and include program abstracts with the names of the program units. These are coded numerically by relevant areas of specialization: (1) International/Intercultural Studies; (1) Latin America; (3) Africa; (4) the Near East and North Africa; (5) Western Europe; (6) Eastern Europe; (7) South Asia; (8) Southeast Asia and Oceania; (9) East Asia; and (10) International Business. Graduate study units conferring advanced degrees are indicated by a number in boldface type. Also, there are distinctive symbols used to indicate the program's degree level, the types of research and resource centers, Title VI foreign area and language fellowships. Language Resource Centers, and international programs of special interest such as Security Affairs, Development Studies, International Communication, and International Technology Management.

The World Area Guides, organized into eight world regions, list more than 400 graduate study abroad programs directly linked to major universities. The Professional Associations and Consortia section describes a dozen relevant professional associations, their events, leadership, and publications, plus the consortia offering graduate study abroad. The Resource Collection includes publications such as Hoopes' Guide to International Education in the U.S., the Institute of International Education's annual guide, Academic Year Abroad, and university catalogs, bulletins, and brochures from the major institutions. The Resource Collection has been assembled for more detailed assessments and serves as a supplement to this report.

Utilization of Findings:

This report is designed to facilitate the needs of policy and program decision makers in the selection of available training program options to prepare personnel to work effectively in foreign countries. Recognizing that Army personnel are assigned in various geographic locations, this overview is organized so that it can be accessed by U.S. regions.

AN OVERVIEW OF INTERCULTURAL TRAINING:

GRADUATE-LEVEL PREPARATION FOR MILITARY SERVICE ABROAD

Introduction

Contingency operations, armed conflicts, and the peacetime duties of U.S. forces abroad have increasingly involved close interactions with allied forces and host country populations. The role of civil affairs and psychological operations personnel has been significant as a "force-multiplier" in this multicultural environment. Three keys to their effectiveness in the field are area expertise, intercultural communication and language skills. The U.S. Army must prepare personnel with these essential skills to face the complex challenges arising in today's rapidly changing world.

The Office of the Commanding General, John F. Kennedy Special Warfare School and Center, Fort Bragg, North Carolina, requested the Manpower and Personnel Research Division, U.S. Army Research Institute (ARI), to provide a review of advanced-level programs available to train personnel to work effectively in foreign countries.

This overview of intercultural training, and particularly graduate programs, aims to serve this purpose. This report identifies the intercultural/international training programs that are now available in the military, public, academic, and private sectors. The terms international (between nations) and intercultural (between cultures), for purposes of this report, are used interchangeably. (However if distinguished, as in the titles of certain programs, international may refer to more formal or diplomatic relations between countries while intercultural applies to less formal interactions between people of different cultural, ethnic, racial or national backgrounds in different nations or within the same nation.)

The objective of this study is to identify intercultural training programs relevant to military personnel. International, intercultural, and area studies are by their nature, inter- and multi-disciplinary. Area studies may be offered as a formal program or through specialization from within a discipline. Thus, degree programs (particularly undergraduate majors) may be labeled by fields of study (e.g., International Relations or Soviet Studies), or—in the case of advanced degrees especially—by discipline (political science, history, etc.). Organized research units, or academic committees, may be the focal point of coordination and expertise graduate students need to connect with when seeking an interdisciplinary program out of several departments' course offerings and degree options. This report identifies focused academic units or departments and other resource centers as well.

This report also includes a discussion of military advanced degree programs which address international issues. It includes other federally supported training as well. Academic sector programs constitute the major part of this overview. Private sector intercultural training and its potential relevancy to the military is discussed.

The Appendixes of this report contain information in detail. There are several sections. One is the US Regional Guides featuring program abstracts of the Institutions of Higher Education (IHEs). It is organized into three regions of the US: the East Coast; Central States; and the West. Over 200 institutions that offer graduate level programs in international and/or area studies are listed. Institutions with programs funded under Title VI appear in boldface type, and many of their graduate study abroad programs are listed by country.

Each program abstract gives the locations and the institution's relevant specialized fields of study. These specializations are identified by the name of the academic unit and labeled numerically as 1. International Studies; 2. Latin America; 3. African Studies; 4. Near East and North Africa; 5. Western Europe; 6. Eastern Europe; 7. South Asia; 8. Southeast Asia and Oceania; 9. East Asia; and 0. International Business. Advanced degree levels offered, concentrations, research or resource centers, and federally supported programs are indicated.

The Appendixes also includes two other sections. The World Area Guides list overseas graduate study programs offered by major institutions of higher education in eight world regions. The Professional Associations and Consortia section describes relevant intercultural and area studies organizations, their events, leadership, and publications.

In addition to this report, there is a Resource Collection. It includes the documents used to compile this report. Readers may prefer to request the most recent college bulletin or department brochure directly from a particular institution. Peterson's Gradline (via Dialog/Knowledge Index) may also provide current information almost anywhere in the world. The program abstracts that follow indicate the academic units offering degrees at each institution by means of a number in bold face (#). The data base can generally access program information at that specific "Unit" level. (Annual updates of the data base go on-line around the first of January each year.)

To provide this overview of intercultural training programs, information was gathered on military, public, academic, and private sector programs from library sources, the Gradline data base, university catalogs, program brochures and association bulletins. Targeted contacts were interviewed by phone and in person. The investigative team emphasized intercultural training programs most relevant to military personnel preparing for service abroad. The information was then labeled and condensed into Program Abstracts with coded categories to facilitate comparing and contrasting programs.

International and Intercultural Training Programs

This report discusses the four types of international/intercultural training programs of potential interest to military personnel: Military Advanced Degree Programs; Public Sector, Federally Supported Programs; Advanced Academic Degree Programs in International and Area Studies; and Private Sector Intercultural Training.

Military Advanced Degree Programs

Only five military institutions currently have the accreditation necessary to confer advanced degrees. These include: the US Army Command and General Staff School at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, the Defense Intelligence College, Washington, D.C.; the Air Force Institute of Technology, Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, Ohio; the Naval Post Graduate School in Monterey, California; the Naval War College in Newport, Rhode Island. The Army War College, Carlisle Barracks, Pennsylvania, maintains a cooperative advanced degree program with three accredited institutions.

The U.S. Army Command and General Staff School at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, (which has the oldest degree program in the U.S. military), confers the degree of Master of Military Arts and Sciences (M.M.A.S.).

The Defense Intelligence College, Washington, D.C. has a forty week Postgraduate Intelligence Program (PGIP). Appropriate graduate study in preparation for service overseas would include concentrations in: Low Intensity Conflict (LIC); National Security Studies; or Third World Intelligence. With the addition of a thesis or two Master's seminars, following the PGIP, the college confers the Master of Science of Strategic Intelligence (MSSI). A three month extension of time in residence at the college may be granted to allow completion of the MSSI.

The Air Force Institute of Technology, Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, Ohio, offers degrees from the School of Engineering and School of Systems and Logistics. Through its Foreign Technology Division (FTD), the Institute also gives a MS of Strategic Intelligence with a concentration in Scientific and Technical Intelligence, which is conferred by the Defense Intelligence College.

The Naval Post Graduate School in Monterey, California offers a Master of Arts in National Security Affairs. This is an 18 month program with classes entering in January and July each year. Four sub-specialties are available: Middle East, Africa, and South Asia; Far East, Southeast Asia, and the Pacific; Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States (formerly the USSR); Western Hemisphere; International Organizations and Negotiations.

The Naval War College, Newport, Rhode Island, awards a Master of Arts in National Security and Strategic Studies to qualified graduates from its Colleges of Naval Warfare (senior grade officers) and Naval Command and Staff (mid-grade officers). The core curriculum is based on three courses of study: Strategy and Policy; National Security Decision Making; and Operations; plus a fourth multi-disciplinary Electives Program. The ten month academic year traditionally opens in August and concludes in June.

The Naval War College graduates its first Master's class in 1992. Students in previous classes customarily secured degrees by completing three extension courses (9 credit hours) through nearby Salve Regina University. Salve Regina generously allows up to 21 transfer credits (most graduate programs allow only 6 to 9 units of transfer credit on a 30 unit degree program). Thus, 21 graduate credit hours earned at the War College can be applied toward their degree in International Relations (MA) or Management (MS).

The US Army War College (USAWC) has now added this same arrangement to its own Cooperative Degree Program on a trial basis as a correspondence course. Two Master of Public Administration programs are also available at Carlisle Barracks as part of the 12-month "resident" program. Both MPA programs limit transfer credits from the USAWC curriculum to 9 credits of a 30-credit hour program at Shippensburg University or Penn State, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

The Army War College cooperative degree program was initiated under a contract with George Washington University for an MA in International Relations (1960 through 1966). At the present time, GWU continues to provide cooperative degrees with the Industrial College of the Armed Forces (ICAF). This is a concurrent one-year Masters in Public Administration (MPA). Although the National Defense University (NDU) is seeking accreditation so that ICAF and its other constituent colleges can confer degrees appropriate to their course offerings, none of the others maintain cooperative degree programs. (Due to their senior rank, most students entering NDU programs already hold advanced degrees.)

In brief, the accredited military institutions conferring advanced degrees appropriate to military personnel preparing for service abroad are the U.S. Army Command and General Staff School, the Defense Intelligence College, the Naval Post Graduate School, the Naval War College, and of limited interest, the Air Force Institute of Technology. Alternatively, there are cooperative degree programs with civilian universities such as those of the Army War College.

Public Sector, Federally Supported Programs

Federally supported programs for international and intercultural training include those in the Department of Education (DOE), the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of State. The DOE Title VI programs are identified in codes described below and also listed in the Appendixes. These codes are used in an overview chart and throughout the US Regional Guide's program abstracts to present information in a condensed format.

Department of Education: Title VI Programs

The U.S. Department of Education (DOE), Office of Postsecondary Education, Center for International Education (CIE) administers funding under Title VI, Part B, of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (as amended). For purposes of this report, the short hand reference will be CIE or Title VI. Title VI funding is the most extensive public sector component in graduate level international studies programs. There are four basic CIE programs associated with Institutions of Higher Education (IHEs):

- 1) the National Resource Centers (NRCs),
either graduate (©) or undergraduate (¢);
- 2) the Foreign Language and Area Studies (FLAS)
fellowship programs (f);
- 3) the Centers for International Business Education (CIBE, also ©).
Some institutions add the initial "R" for Research (i.e. CIBER).
- 4) the three Language Resource Centers (LRCs or L).

The National Resource Centers and fellowship programs provide grants to institutions of higher education, primarily to support the teaching and study of less commonly taught languages and world areas. Fellowships are awarded through the institutions to study in these foreign language and area study programs.

The Centers for International Business Education (CIBEs) designations are relatively new. There are currently sixteen centers, five started in 1989, with eleven more added in 1990. The purpose of these Business and International Education Programs is to promote education and training that contributes to the benefit of the American people, specifically to the ability of U.S. business to prosper in an international economy. Two specific purposes of the CIBEs are: to provide instruction in critical foreign languages and international fields needed to provide an understanding of the cultures and customs of United States' trading partners; and to provide training to students enrolled in the institution, or combination of institutions, in which a center is located.

The Title VI programs of the participating institutions of higher education are represented on a two-page chart (see Chart 1a and 1b) compiled for this report. The names of the institutions of higher education (IHE), states (St) and zip codes (code) are in the left column, grouped by postal zones (from 01003 to 98195) so that joint centers appear in close proximity. Fields of study are indicated across the top of the page by ten numerals, #1 to #0, as explained below.

Title VI by the "Numbers" A numerical arrangement consistent with the area study groupings used by the Center for International Education (CIE) has been adopted as a standard convention for information displays throughout this report. Conceptually, a ten category by ten category grid is used to arrange all information about the Title VI program-- with IHEs grouped into geographic zones according to their zip code, and their academic programs arranged in ten categories.

While the initial digits of the postal zip codes progress from 0 (Puerto Rico and New England) moving westward like the sun to 9 (Hawaii and Alaska), the numerical order chosen for global regions advances in the opposite direction, from the Western Hemisphere toward the Far East and the Pacific Rim. Thus, the 10 divisions utilized by CIE have been numbered proceeding across the world map from left to right (1-2-3 etc.).

Starting from North America, study and research programs are represented as follows: the primary field of study is international studies, designated number "1". U.S. foreign policy, foreign affairs, international affairs and/or international relations -- are all grouped under the "1" heading. (Specialized components of international studies such as development, security affairs and international communications are distinguished by non-numerical symbols.) Continuing the numerical sequence, "2" is Latin America and "3" Sub-Saharan Africa, while "4" is the Near East and North Africa (a.k.a. Middle East).

The numbers 5 and above are broken down into sub-areas: "5" represents Western Europe and "6" Eastern Europe and the Russian states (a generalized European designation would arbitrarily go under "6"); the numbers "7,8,9" are used with reference to Asia, with "8" serving as the catch-all figure (covering "Inner Asia" or "Asia and the Pacific", etc.). No definitive boundaries are ascribed when using "7" for South Asia, "8" for Southeast Asia and Oceania, and "9" for East Asia. However, South Asia generally refers to the Indian sub-continent and neighboring countries; Southeast Asia and Oceania generally encompasses Indochina and the island nations such as Indonesia, the Philippines, Australia, etc.; and East Asia usually refers to China, Taiwan, Japan and Korea, the economic powerhouses of the "Pacific Rim."

Completing the series, "0" is for international business, managing multinationals, foreign trade, etc. Special issues in international management practices are distinguished by non-numerical symbols.

On the overview chart, a dash - or "minus sign" preceding a number or symbol indicates that a program is linked to another institution as part of a 2 - 3 unit consortium.

Typographic distinctions are used to convey information in the following chart. Variations in the typeface indicate differences in the federal program support at each institution. To illustrate these program distinctions, numbers in shadowed print denote National Resource Centers (NRCs) that administer Foreign Language and Area Studies (FLAS) fellowships (e.g. 1). The few Graduate NRCs that do not administer such fellowships are indicated by a figure in solid bold print (2). Institutions that are designated as undergraduate NRCs are indicated by a number in a smaller, plain, font face that is underlined (3). Some undergraduate NRCs and other institutions administer (Title VI and IX) graduate level fellowships; for them a camera aperture sign (f) indicates the availability of federal fellowships.

Prior military utilization of the Title VI programs is depicted in the "F.A.O. lists" column. That column indicates institutions on the original (1985) FLAS list first approved for the Army's Foreign Area Officer (F.A.O.) Graduate Degree Completion Program. These appear in a smaller italic typeface (4). Numbers with boldface italic and underlining for emphasis are those programs that were subsequently identified as "high quality programs" for FAOs (5). "High quality programs" that were not on CIE's FLAS list are placed within parentheses (6).

Throughout the appendixes, federally supported NRCs and CIBEs are indicated not by variations in the typeface but with variants of the lower case letter "c." A National Resource Center or Center for International Business Education & Research is represented by the copyright marking ©. Constituent units of a multi-campus NRC or CIBE are indicated with a cents sign, ¢. The Undergraduate Centers are indicated by a small, bold face ¢.

Non-numerical coding is used to indicate organized research units, or other specialized teaching and learning resource centers (apart from libraries). An "r" within a circle, ®, represents campus research or resource centers without Title VI support. Specialized programs are indicated with distinctive codes. These are the Delta sign Δ for Development Studies; the double daggers symbol ‡ for Security Affairs; the paragraph symbol ¶ for International Communications; and the spiraling arms on the symbol for a numbered clause §, (suggestive of spinoff) denotes International Technology Management.

Other Federally Funded Intercultural Training Programs

Three specific institutions should also be noted, The Foreign Service Institute, The U.S.D.A. Graduate School, and the East-West Center.

The Foreign Service Institute in Arlington, Virginia, under the Department of State, conducts seminars in its School of Area Studies but does not confer degrees. These courses highlight key historical, political, economic, and socio-cultural themes for each world region. Designed for the pragmatic needs of U.S. government employees, they also feature American interests and policy issues in the region. The academic level of these courses is designed to approximate upper division undergraduate work.

The U.S.D.A. Graduate School The Department of Agriculture's International Institute for Development in Washington, D.C. conducts three certificate programs. They are in International Management Development, Management Information Systems, and Project Analysis. Additionally there are numerous courses, some of which have been designated as receiving college credit by the American Council on Education's Program on Non-collegiate Sponsored Instruction. Through cooperative agreements with George Washington University some Graduate School students receive M.S. degrees.

The East-West Center (EWC) is a non-profit educational corporation located adjacent to the University of Hawaii, Manoa campus in Honolulu, Hawaii. It was established in 1960 by the United States Congress and is funded by Congressional appropriation, with additional financial contributions from Asian and Pacific governments, foundations, etc. Multi-disciplinary teams of specialists address major problems of international issues within the Center's four research Institutes: Culture and Communication (including Journalism); Environment and Policy; Population; and Resource Systems (including Economic Development-Policy and Resources Programs).

The EWC International Relations Program focuses on foreign policy and related political, economic and security issues of the Asia-Pacific region. There is also an EWC Pacific Islands Development Program. Additionally, Open Grants provides flexible educational programs for graduate students in fields not directly linked to the research areas. The Center annually awards grants to more than 200 research fellows and to around 100 graduate students who work towards master's and doctoral degrees at the University of Hawaii while participating in EWC projects.

In brief, this section of the report focused on government supported programs that are potentially relevant to international training for military personnel preparing for service abroad. Extensive federal funding is provided through Title VI programs by the U.S. Department of Education. Interested persons may apply for FLAS fellowships through appropriate institutions. Graduate National Resource Centers serve to enhance the quality of international education and may influence selection of a university program. A two-page chart facilitates comparing the participating IHEs. The Foreign Service Institute of the Department of State, and the International Institute for Development of the US Department of Agriculture, have federally funded, non-degree, international training programs. The East-West Center awards grants for research or study with degrees from the adjacent University of Hawaii.

Advanced Academic Degrees in International and Area Studies

This report focuses on the institutions of higher education (IHEs) that could prepare military personnel for service abroad by conferring a MA degree with an international or area emphasis. Over 200 institutions offer these at the graduate level. Information is discussed here in general terms with details in the Appendixes.

Programs included in this report are primarily in the social sciences (political science, history, economics, etc.) with an international component and not the purely linguistic or literary programs of study. As noted earlier, area studies programs are inherently multi-disciplinary. Therefore academic labeling of degree programs varies considerably. For example, broad terms like "Hispanic," "Iberian," and "Slavic" studies, may be limited in some applications to only classic literature and philology or may deal with the contemporary dynamics of societies spanning continents.

U.S. Regional Guides to international and area studies feature program abstracts identifying over 700 intercultural training programs at 200 institutions of higher education (IHEs) that offer graduate level programs in those degree fields especially appropriate to preparing military personnel for service abroad. Each abstract includes the institutional name, location and academic units offering research and graduate degrees in international studies, specific geographic area studies, and/or international business. Also indicated are language resource centers and international programs of special interest including security affairs, development studies, international communication and international technology management. The program abstract is coded consistently with the same numbering scheme used for Title VI programs described in the previous section. Institutions with Title VI federal funding appear in boldface type. The program abstracts of some of these IHEs also include a list of their graduate studies abroad programs by country and city.

This section is organized by geographic regions within the U.S. into three main divisions. The first division is labeled Eastern States - which includes Puerto Rico, New England, Mid-Atlantic, and Southern States. The second division is Central States. The Western States include Hawaii and Alaska (with Canada added for good measure). Each region is subdivided by postal zones into states. However, within states, institutions are listed alphabetically so that related institutions with more than one campus appear as a group.

World Area Guides list more than 400 academic graduate study abroad programs. It is grouped by the major world areas with sub-divisions: Latin America; Africa (Sub-Saharan); the Near East and North Africa; Western Europe; Eastern Europe; South Asia, Southeast Asia including Oceania; and East Asia. Within each region there is a list by country of overseas programs offered by US institutions of higher education. Academic study programs offered by a consortium of universities are also included.

The programs listed apply to graduate students, and/or are affiliated with an undergraduate exchange offering graduate student credit. Programs are subject to change, thus it is recommended that university selection based on an overseas study program be confirmed. Credit for independent or affiliated graduate study abroad may be arranged individually through a department, depending on their policies. Some MBA programs require graduate study and internships abroad for completion.

An example of opportunities for graduate study abroad is offered through the University of California (UC). The University of California (with its nine campuses, UCLA, UC Berkeley etc.) has a system-wide Education Abroad Program (EAP) at more than 90 institutions in 32 countries worldwide. Their Education Abroad Program arranges reciprocal exchange agreements with foreign universities in some cases, affiliates with consortia programs in others, and/or conducts its own programs. While most study abroad is primarily for undergraduate students, graduate students may, with approval from their academic department, pursue study or research abroad through many of these EAP study centers. The EAP central office is located at UC Santa Barbara.

Descriptions of study abroad programs are available in university catalogs and brochures. These are in the Resource Collection. The publication of the Institute of International Education, Academic Year Abroad (annually updated and published each April) provides a comprehensive list and is included in the Resource Collection.

The Resource Collection includes publications such as the above named Academic Year Abroad, Hoopes' Guide to International Education in the U.S., and numerous university catalogs, brochures and/or bulletins from the institutions of higher education that appear in boldface type in the US Regional Guide. A list of these documents accompanies the collection.

Institutional Features of Special Interest There are institutions of higher education that may be of special interest because of features that are uniquely advantageous in the context of military personnel preparing for service abroad. Among these features are: the duration of MA programs; the flexibility of course schedules; the location and availability of off-campus degree programs; the collaborative degree programs with business; and other MA degree fields related to military service abroad.

Duration of the MA program is a consideration for active duty military personnel. The length of MA programs varies from one to three years. For example, Columbia University offers a compressed one year curriculum for professionals on a study sabbatical. In contrast, some MBA degree programs, such as the "hard language" ones at the University of South Carolina require three years of full time study to attain language proficiency. Other schools that have accelerated curriculums for mid-career students include George Washington University (12-15 months); Arthur D. Little (1 year); the Johns Hopkins Bologna Center in Italy (1 year); Salve Regina's MA & MS degrees currently offered through the Army War College at Carlisle Barracks, allow transfer of up to 21 semester graduate units of ACE approved military studies (or 70% of a 30 unit program) with the balance available via three University correspondence courses.

Flexibility of course schedules is another consideration. The traditional academic program has been modified by some institutions to meet the needs of mid-career adults. These innovative course schedules range from weekend seminars twice a month for two years, to condensed evening and weekend courses completed in one month segments. For example, a specialized schedule utilized in many schools of business is the "executive MBA" program. The general pattern is for classes to meet on Friday and Saturday of every other week over a two year period. For example, the American Graduate School in International Management in Arizona (a.k.a. Thunderbird) packages a streamline version of its standard curriculum which follows this pattern. George Washington University offers weekend schedules, designed especially for government professionals.

An institution's location and off-campus degree programs are factors relevant for military personnel. Thus the U.S. Regional Guide in Appendix B is organized by geographic location. As described above, there are three main regions: East Coast; Central; and West. The guide is organized by zip codes with the names of institutions arranged alphabetically within states. Most universities, like other institutions, tend to change slowly. Nonetheless, off-campus degree programs may be a trend of the future, and could be fostered through cooperative arrangements. Although there are some universities with off-campus degree programs, few offer the combination of graduate degrees and specializations in intercultural studies.

Some of the institutions within the scope of this study feature off-campus degree programs. George Washington University has a detailed publication of its off-campus courses, many designed to facilitate study by military personnel on and near military bases. Troy State University offers its MA in International Relations and MPA (Masters in Public Administration) at posts throughout the southern states and at bases in Europe and Turkey. A newer institution, National University, has many campuses located for convenience to working students, including military personnel, in locations throughout California with a campus in Costa Rica. The University of Maryland, which has undergraduate classes on military bases in Europe, however only offers a master's in International Management on its main campus.

There are examples of educational collaboration between institutions of higher education and private companies. There is the Georgetown University School of Foreign Service and IBM International Personnel Institute's week-long program. The Institute is attended by 25 of IBM's senior personnel executives and draws on the experience of Washington policy-makers, senior academicians and business leaders affiliated with the School. Discussions center on how international affairs affects business strategies and forecasts, emphasizing global labor and management trends. Georgetown University School of Foreign Service also hosts IBM's International Education Symposium in a similar week long format for 25 IBM executives.

An innovative approach to private enterprise and educational institutions collaboration is the accredited degree offered by the Arthur D. Little Management Education Institute in Cambridge, MA. When this well known company was unable to find a graduate program with flexibility to meet its needs, it established its own Institute. Many of its professors teach concurrently at established institutions in the area and for the Institute.

In brief, this section of the report discusses the academic sector programs. Intercultural advanced degree programs that prepare personnel for military service abroad are listed in the U.S. Regional Guides, Appendix B, with over 200 relevant program abstracts.

Private Sector Intercultural Training

This portion of the report deals with the private sector and its relevance to training military personnel for service abroad. It is divided into three sections: the investigative procedure, the findings, and the potential utilization. The findings encompass two types of private sector intercultural/international training: in-house programs or external consulting.

Investigative Procedure

The procedure for this exploratory investigation of private sector intercultural/international training was primarily based on 89 interviews: 15 with corporate managers; 15 with external consultants; 18 with the leaders of federally funded Title VI Centers for Business, Education and Research; more than 20 key people from professional associations; and 21 U.S. executives and family members with overseas assignments.

Interviews ranging from 10 to 30 minutes were conducted by telephone, and also in person in conjunction with professional conferences. Executives are from small as well as large companies, including Fortune 100 companies. Individuals are not identified by name to comply with a few requests for confidentiality. Most people were open and willing to provide information.

There was a computer search and cursory review of the literature to verify the investigative findings. A computer search of Infotrac on "cross-cultural orientation" and "intercultural education" plus a second computer search of Dialog's ABI/INFORM, (a data base of business practices, corporate strategies, and trends from August 1971 to the present) on "cross cultural, management, and training" were conducted.

Private Sector Lack of Emphasis on Intercultural Training Programs

The private sector intercultural training programs were consistently described as: "not enough" or "non-existent." The discussions with company officials, professional association leaders, in-house and external trainers, individuals who received training and those who had no pre-departure training, revealed that the private sector does not place great emphasis on preparation for personnel going overseas, either on a short term basis, or for in-residence assignments abroad. A significant factor is often the lack of advance notice prior to an individual's departure for overseas.

It should be noted that companies that have human resource development managers with intercultural sensitivity tend to do more in terms of preparation for overseas effectiveness, nonetheless, these programs are not standardized. For mid-career personnel preparing to go overseas, the more practical short term training programs with consulting companies are preferred, rather than a career disrupting 1 to 2 year university degree program. Interculturally sensitized human resource development managers try to balance technical competence with intercultural competence. In contrast, department managers prioritize technical competence without much consideration of intercultural skills.

The findings based on the information gathered are organized into three categories. The first category is external consultant training.

Private Sector Use of External Consultants

A limited number of companies (e.g. IBM, Eastman Kodak Company, Aetna Life and Casualty Company, Monsanto Company, and Baxter International, Inc.) use outside consulting firms to train personnel designated for overseas assignments. This training is usually client-specific: i.e. not standardized, and normally consists of sessions for individuals or small groups, designed to meet the specific needs of the participants and/or their families in terms of orientation and language training. In contrast to orientation programs, language training necessitates both intensive and extensive training. Consequently many companies offer only a very limited exposure to the language prior to departure, with follow-up lessons later in-country.

Overall, the orientation training by external consultants varies from one day to several weeks, and may range from a presentation in a briefing session to a full participatory program. External consultants either go to the company or conduct the training off-site. Some of these consultants provide in-country relocation services as well.

There are several intercultural consulting companies that emerge as leaders in this field. Among those most frequently named (in alphabetical order) were BCIU Institute (Business Council for International Understanding, American University, Washington, D.C.), Bennet and Associates (Wilmette, IL), Clark Consulting Group (Redwood City, CA), International Orientation Resources (Northbrook, IL), and Moran, Stahl and Boyer (Boulder, CO), also George Renwick (of Carefree, AZ currently with Intercultural Press of Yarmouth, ME).

Private Sector Intercultural In-house Training

The second type of private sector training is in-house. Inter-cultural in-house training is found in only a few companies. This lack of intercultural in-house training was attributed to the difficulty of providing the resources needed to cover the broad spectrum of geographic areas, countries, and specific business practices of various cultures. Additionally, as discussed above, often managers do not recognize nor place value or importance on issues beyond technical expertise.

Nonetheless, there are a few companies that have in-house departments to train people for overseas work. Among these are Exxon Corporation, Digital Equipment Corporation, and Intel Corporation. The content, duration, and style of these in-house intercultural training programs varies. Some companies with in-house training offer country-specific information, while others provide only generalized culture awareness training. They often use in-house resources such as U.S. employees who have lived abroad or have returned from overseas assignments.

Often the in-house training consists of one-on-one individual sessions to prepare an employee for an overseas assignment. Although the in-house trainer may be a full-time employee, who is qualified and experienced, the demands of preparing someone for today's diverse and rapidly changing business and political world, is a major challenge. People interviewed out in the field reported that, whatever training they received prior to departure, it was still not enough.

Potential Utilization of Private Sector Intercultural Training

The potential for utilization of private sector intercultural training programs depends on whether military personnel are seeking a degree or focused information. Neither in-house intercultural training programs nor external consultants programs offers a degree, nor do they now offer standard intercultural training that is directly relevant to military officers. The in-house material is generally company specific and not usually available to outsiders.

On the other hand, these private sector external consultants target their training to a clients' needs; therefore, potentially, an external consultant could target and refocus their training to meet specific intercultural or language training needs of military personnel.

Findings Verified in the Literature

The investigation of private sector intercultural/international training indicated that few companies provide training, either in-house or using external consultants, and that individuals interviewed in the field felt that the training was not enough. This low priority on preparation for overseas assignments was found in the literature as well.

The computer searches (see procedures above) and a cursory review of the literature verified the findings of the investigative team. The literature stressed the importance and effectiveness of intercultural training. One of the articles is representative of the literature and therefore its abstract is quoted:

Abstract: A survey of 40 executives conducted by Eastern Michigan University reveals that employees of firms conducting business in foreign countries should have knowledge of their host countries social norms, technical expertise, as well as language skills. While few US firms provide training for executives to learn foreign language or cultural skills, survey respondents report that the business areas which provide good preparation for entry-level international jobs include marketing and sales, accounting and finance. Human Resource professionals who want to help executives acquire international skills should conduct a needs analysis and examine the ability of employees' families to adapt to foreign cultures, foreign language or cultural skills. (McEnery, Jean & Gaston DesHarnais, "Culture Shock," Training and Development Journal, April 1990, Pg 43).

Summary on Private Sector Intercultural Training Programs

The findings can be presented from the perspectives of those most involved with private sector intercultural training: company managers; intercultural trainers; and the employees assigned overseas. In general (recognizing that variations exist), company managers often prioritize technical rather than intercultural competence, and are naturally concerned with cost. Consequently few companies provide in-depth training. On the other hand, intercultural trainers understand the value of intercultural training and promote it. The interviewed employees who had been assigned overseas stated that they felt they could have benefitted from more intercultural training. The literature verified these findings.

A consultant could target training to meet the needs of military personnel. There are progressive levels involved in training. First there is awareness or comprehension, then there is initial capability to perform, and ultimately there is mastery. This later level is continually refined with new experiences and information. We are now in a most dynamic era of change. In addition to more formal intercultural training, study, work, or service abroad are valuable, especially when combined with advanced preparation and mentoring. The advantage of external intercultural consultants is an outsiders' perspective. The military has a sub-culture of its own, thus, a consultant might serve as a "culture broker" at several levels.

Conclusion

This report provides an overview of more than a thousand graduate level international/intercultural training programs in the U.S. and abroad. The purpose of this overview is to identify research and training programs to prepare military personnel to work effectively in foreign countries. It is aimed at policy makers and planners for mid-career personnel.

The report describes the advanced level intercultural, international and area training programs in the military, public, academic, and private sectors. The Appendixes of this report contain more detailed information. There are three US Regional Guides: Eastern, Central and Western States. The guides contain 200 program abstracts of institutions of higher education identifying over 700 relevant advanced degree programs, research and resource centers. The World Area Guides list more than 400 overseas opportunities for graduate study in conjunction with university degree programs in eight world regions. The Professional Associations and Consortia section describes over a dozen pertinent organizations. A Resource Collection contains publications on international education, overseas study, plus university graduate school catalogs, bulletins, and program brochures.

Training involves more than knowledge from the classroom. It is not complete without experiential learning. This is readily recognized for participating in sports, using computers, or flying an airplane, and applies to intercultural interactions as well. The difference between learning and functioning effectively can be illustrated by common examples from language classroom exercises which are essentially behaviors from the students' own experience translated into another language. Examples include ordering from a printed menu or making purchases at fixed prices, which may not be consistent with everyday customs in the country. There is a Native American Indian saying that, "To understand another, you must walk in their moccasins." That is difficult, but to "walk" the same trails as another provides insights. For this reason, this overview includes information about programs for graduate study abroad.

A case study that illustrates this point relates to the US military relief efforts for Kurdish refugees following the 1991 conflict in the Persian Gulf. The logistical expertise arrayed so successfully in Operation Desert Storm also provided the basis for a civil affairs effort, Operation Provide Comfort. The full success of this operation depended upon an effective interface, not only with the native Kurdish leadership and Turkish officials, but also required coordination (i.e. "deconfliction") with the operating norms of allied forces and various non-governmental relief agencies from different nations. In addition to American military personnel, there were embassy liaison teams with American bi-lingual, bi-cultural diplomats and foreign service nationals (Turkish citizens employed by the American embassy and consulates).

Information is based primarily on interviews with American foreign service officers in Turkey who had been part of the advance teams and spent 2 - 3 weeks at the border area. Those interviewed commended the US military teams for their efficient and smooth work. Essentially the achievement of the US foreign policy aims depended upon logistical expertise, area knowledge, cross cultural and language skills plus the ability to build upon productive prior working relationships. Those interviewed emphasized the value of contacts in these countries. They underscored the importance of establishing and maintaining host nation contacts through the Defense Attaches' office at embassies abroad.

In conclusion, the case of the Kurdish emergency assistance points to the increasing involvement of US forces in peacetime operations abroad with allied military forces and other local populations. Intercultural training requires advance preparation to acquire and maintain the necessary skills: area expertise, language fluency plus the accompanying cultural and behavioral sensitivity. Additionally, and perhaps most significant is the long-term networks of contacts established through shared experiences striving toward common goals. The dual importance of "what you know and who you know" is acknowledged in America and is an even stronger custom in most other places in the world. Networks of contacts, like language mastery, cannot be acquired instantly. Preparation through advanced training and field experience are the hallmarks of a professional, in the military, in the intercultural field, as in other professions.

This Overview of Intercultural Training is but one of many starting points to face the complex challenges in today's rapidly changing world. Situations may change, but bridges of knowledge and collegial bonds can form building blocks for the future.
